Losing a spouse is a traumatic event. It drains your emotions and makes it hard to focus on simple daily tasks, let alone financial matters. Unfortunately, financial obligations don’t stop for grief; there are bills to be paid and decisions to be made. Taking an active role in your finances and in understanding the key financial issues you could face before they happen can help you implement a plan that will bring more confidence and clarity to your life.