Julia Littell

Professor Julia Littell teaches courses on research methodology, social and behavioral theory, and child welfare at the Graduate School of Social Work and Social Research at Bryn Mawr College. She earned two graduate degrees at the University of Chicago. Her research examines the processes and outcomes of complex psychosocial interventions for children and families, and the uses and misuses of empirical research in social policy and clinical practice. She has conducted large, randomized controlled trials on the relative effects of home- and community-based interventions for families in the U.S. child welfare system.

Professor Littell has published widely on topics related to research methods, research synthesis, social work practice, and social policy. She received the Pro Humanitate Literary Award in 2006 and again in 2009 for articles on methods of research synthesis and evidence-based practice and policy.

From 2004 to 2009, she served as a member of the Campbell Collaboration Steering Group and was Co-Chair and Editor for the Campbell Social Welfare Group. She is the lead author of a systematic review that is jointly registered in the Cochrane and Campbell Collaborations. Professor Littell currently serves as Associate Editor of the new Wiley/Blackwell journal, Research Synthesis Methodology.
